Excerpt: .and beg for food with his little mouth very widely opened. As young birds grow and rill the cavity of cupshaped nests, the mother bird, when covering them during periods of rest from her labours and at night-time, is lifted higher and higher; and it is no uncommon thing to see her sitting in the elevated position depicted in the illustration of a Blackcap on the opposite page, with three or four inquiring heads thrust from beneath her wings and puffed-out breast feathers. Chicks that have to be left in a nest whilst their parents fly a long way off in search of food are no doubt a source of great anxiety; but so are those that run about with their elders directly they are hatched. One day, whilst lying hidden in a crevice of rock by the sea, I saw a pair of...
